The State Of The Union For Covid—We're Not Out Of The Woods Yet.

In this, the 50th edition of the PFT Coronavirus update, we're offering up one of the more compelling current assessments of "where we stand" as a nation in our ongoing battle against COVID-19.

The most important takeaway from today's NY TIMES newsletter (first article) is that we have yet to fully surpass the imminent threat this virus represents. The good news is that it appears our aggressive national vaccination rollout—coupled with the sad reality of millions of Americans receiving a level of immunity by being exposed to the virus—has prevented a truly dire “fourth wave” of Coronavirus.

But nationwide, vaccine hesitancy and outright unwillingness to become part of fully vaccinated America presents a tangible obstacle to the herd immunity necessary for an authentic return to normalcy.

Despite the good news, it's worth emphasizing that the crisis is not yet over. There are two big Covid problems, both involving vaccination.

First, roughly one in three American adults remain skeptical of the vaccine, including many older people, who are at the highest risk of severe versions of Covid. In the most recent poll by the Kaiser Family Foundation, 13 percent of adults said they would definitely not get a shot; 6 percent said they would do so only if required by their employer, their school or another group; and 15 percent said they were waiting to see how the vaccines affected others. -- David Leonhardt, NY Times
